There are many differences in creation myths around the world, but there are also some striking similarities. For one thing, their imagery often comes from the idea of a supreme craftsman. The beauty of the natural world is represented as the work of a skilled craftsman, instances of which are found in all cultures. Another common image is the growth of order from chaos, mirroring the progressive organization of human society. Yet another parallel is the universe as a biological process. The most striking examples of this occur in myths that describe the universe as forming from an egg or seed.

私たちは桜の花をとてもいつくしみ、その美しさをたたえる歌や絵画をあらゆる時 代に生み出してきているほどだ。 If making music isn't the most ancient of human activities, it's got to be pretty close. Melody and rhythm can stir up feelings from sadness to peace to joy to wonder; they can bring memories from childhood vividly back to life.

From an evolutionary point of view, however, music doesn't seem to make sense. Unlike sex, say, or food, it did nothing to help our distant ancestors survive and reproduce. Yet music and its effects are in powerful evidence across almost all cultures, so it must satisfy some sort of universal need — often in ways we can't begin to understand. A few years ago when she was feeling depressed, a single work of Brahms made Valorie Salimpoor feel much better almost immediately, and from that moment, she decided it would be her life's work to figure out music's mysteries.

It's working out pretty well so far: in the latest issue of Science, Salimpoor, now a neuroscientist* at McGill University in Montreal, and other researchers in her field report that music stimulates activity in the part of the brain that releases the "pleasure chemical" dopamine during sex and eating. Animals get that same thrill from food and sex, but not from music.

But music also affects other parts of the brain. "Music also activates the amygdala*," says Salimpoor, "which is involved with the processing of emotion, as well as areas of the prefrontal cortex* involved in abstract* decision-making. When we're listening to music, the most advanced areas of the brain link up with the most ancient."

That, it turns out, may be the key to music's power. In the experiments reported in Science, Salimpoor's research team tested subjects* for their responses to music by having them listen not to songs they already knew (which might be too closely linked to pleasurable memories such as their first kiss), but to songs they have never heard. Researchers chose these songs according to each subject's preferences.

The subjects listened to the first 30 seconds of each tune as the scientists monitored their brains with an fMRI imager*. Then, to provide some objective way to measure how much the subjects actually liked each piece of music, they were asked how much they'd pay to buy the whole song, from zero up to $2.

What the scientists found was that the subjects were willing to pay more for songs that had the strongest response from both the emotional and intellectual parts of the brain. And that suggests that people get not just pleasure from listening to music but a direct intellectual reward too — even if they're not aware of it. The nature of that reward, Salimpoor believes, based on this and earlier research, has to do with pattern recognition and prediction. She claims that as an unknown song progresses, our brains predict how it will go on.

These predictions are culture-dependent and based on experience: someone who grew up on rock or Western classical music won't be able to predict the course of an Indian folk song, for example. But if a song develops in a way that's both slightly unexpected and still in line with our brain's prediction, we tend to like it a lot. And that, says Salimpoor, "is because we've made a kind of intellectual step forward."

Music may, in other words, stimulate a brain mechanism that was key to our evolutionary progress. The ability to recognize patterns and generalize from experience, to predict what's likely to happen in the future — in short, the ability to imagine — is something humans do far better than any other animals. It's what allowed us to endure.

If music is closely related to this most important of survival mechanisms, no wonder (β). "People often put music on the list of the top five things that are most pleasurable for them," says Salimpoor. You surely thought of none of this the first time you heard your all-time favorite song — nor would you have wanted to — but it helps explain why you've listened to it ever since.

 - ① Making music is probably one of the oldest human activities we know.
 - While music is very pleasant for listeners, it has no purpose other than to bring back old memories or make us feel certain emotions.
 - The scientist featured in this article decided to conduct research because music had little impact in her daily life.
 - There is evidence to suggest that animals derive pleasure from music as much as humans do.
 - (5) When listening to music, the listener's brain is affected in several ways.
 - ⑥ In the research experiment, the subjects only listened to songs they knew.
 - ① In the research experiment, the subjects had to judge each song according to the difficulty of memorizing the melody.
 - Music may be a universal activity, but when we hear a short phrase from an unknown folk song from another culture, we have a hard time predicting the entire melody.
 - Distening to music is important not only because it gives us pleasure. It also stimulates our capacity to predict the immediate future in terms of sound.
