[II] つきの英文を読んで下記の間に答えなさい。

When it comes to expressing positive emotion, the common belief is that cause and effect work in one direction. First comes a happy feeling. That's followed by a smile or maybe a laugh. Then, when the feeling runs its natural course, the outward expression stops.

A

The facial-feedback hypothesis of emotional expression is an alternative explanation. It holds that physically expressing an emotion sends a biochemical signal from the facial muscles that loops back to the brain, in much the same way that sound coming from a speaker can be picked up by a microphone and sent back through the speaker as amplified feedback. Charles Darwin was among the first scientists to put forth this idea, stating that "the free expression by outward signs of an emotion intensifies it. On the other hand, the repression, as far as this is possible, of all outward signs softens our emotions. Even the simulation of an emotion tends to arouse it in our minds."

The best way to test this theory is to simulate the muscular change of a facial expression and see if this alters the subject's emotional state. A 1988 study by researchers at the University of Mannheim, Federal Republic of Germany, did just that. Participants were told to hold a pen in their mouths in one of two ways—in their lips, which activated the muscle used in frowning; or in their teeth, which employed the muscle used in smiling. Then both groups were shown a cartoon and told to evaluate how funny they found it.

Members of the "teeth" group reported finding the cartoon significantly more amusing than did those in the "lips" group. Further, the study was carefully designed: Unlike previous studies that instructed participants to fake a smile or frown, this one gave them no clues whatsoever as to what kinds of emotions they might be expected to feel. This and similar studies demonstrate clearly that, on an individual level, emotions stimulate physical expressions, and physical expressions stimulate emotions.

B When we see or hear people laugh, we tend to laugh ourselves, which makes them laugh more, and so on. This means that a group of people who are laughing produces powerful internal and external feedback loops of positive emotion, making laughing together one of life's greatest pleasures. Watching funny movies with friends and attending comic performances are good ways to enjoy these wonderful, complex, social webs of good feeling.

What you should understand is that expressing emotion is a key component of feeling emotion. Sadly, many people laugh only a little, or quietly, as if they feel to laugh long and loudly is undignified, an unacceptable behavior. This may be a product of culture. Japanese often cover their mouths when laughing, as if to conceal it. Conversely, I have known Brazilians who habitually throw the head back and roar with laughter, sometimes even collapsing as a group into a giggling, exhausted heap. I respect both cultures, but here I think C .

[III] つぎの英文を読んで下記の問い合わせに答えなさい。

Wednesday was my last day at this firm. After almost 12 years — first as a summer intern, A in New York for 10 years, and now in London — I believe I have worked there long enough to understand its culture, its people and its identity. And I can honestly say that the environment now is as poisonous and destructive as I have ever seen it.

To put the problem in the simplest terms, the interests of the client continue to be pushed aside in the way the firm operates and thinks about making money. The firm is one of the world's largest and most important investment banks and it is too essential to global finance to continue to act this way. The firm has changed course so far from the place I joined right out of college that I can no longer say that I identify with what it stands for.

It might sound surprising to a suspicious public, but culture was always a vital part of this firm's success. It revolved around teamwork, honesty and always doing right by our clients. The culture was what made the place great and allowed us to earn our clients' trust for 143 years. It wasn't just about making money; this B will not sustain a firm for so long. It had something to do with pride and belief in the organization. I look around today and see almost no trace of the culture that made me love working for this firm for many years. I no longer have the pride, or the belief.

But this was not always the case. For more than a decade I recruited and mentored candidates through our difficult interview process. In 2006, I managed the summer intern program in sales and trading in New York for the 80 college students who made the cut, out of the thousands who applied. ⁽⁷⁾ I knew it was time to leave when I realized I could no longer look students in the eye and tell them what a great place this was to work.

When the history books are written about this firm, they may reflect that the current chief executive officer and the president lost hold of the firm's culture on their watch. I truly believe that this decline in the firm's business ethics represents the C most serious threat to its long-run survival.

Over the course of my career I have always taken pride in advising my clients to do what I believe is right for them, even if it means D money for the firm. This view is becoming increasingly unpopular at the firm.

How did we get here? The firm changed the way it thought about leadership. Leadership used to be about ideas, setting an example and doing the right thing. Today, if you make enough money for the firm, you will be promoted into a position of influence.

What is a quick way to become a leader? Persuade your clients to invest in the stocks or other products that we are trying to 1 because they are not seen as having a lot of potential profit. It makes me ill how insensitively people talk about ripping their clients off.

When I was a first-year analyst I was taught to be concerned with learning the ropes, understanding finance, getting to know our clients, learning how they defined success and what we could do to help them get there.

My proudest moments in life—such as getting a full scholarship to go from South Africa to Stanford University or winning a bronze medal for table tennis at an important tournament in Israel—have all come through hard work, with no shortcuts. This firm today has become too much about shortcuts and not E about achievement.

I hope this can be a wake-up call to the board of directors. Make the client the focal point of your business again. Without clients you will not make money. In fact, you will not exist. Remove the morally corrupt people, no matter how much money they make for the firm. And get the culture right again, so people want to work here for the right reasons.

People who don't (1) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6)
will not sustain this firm — or the trust of its clients — for very much longer.

[IV] つぎの英文のインタビューを読んで下記の問いに答えなさい。

Interviewer: Why did you want to join the police force?

Nakabayashi: I was in high school during the postwar period of rapid economic development, around 1960. I thought a lot about what I should do, whether I should go to university or not. The newspapers were full of stories about gang wars, and I became interested in the police force and their tough detectives who were standing up to the gangs. The police force was the "university" for me.

Interviewer: You joined in 1962, two years before the Tokyo Olympics. Was the job what you expected it to be?

Nakabayashi: Yes. It was an extremely tense period. The gangs had taken advantage of the confused postwar situation, and in 1963, they hit the peak of their membership, about 184,200.

Interviewer: What kind of training did you receive at detective school?

Nakabayashi: They taught us how to think as a team, how to develop a feeling for detective work, how to show A — and how dedication, sincerity, and strength of will are essential.

Interviewer: What was your first assignment after you became a detective?

Nakabayashi: I was sent to a suburb out near Kichijoji. The most common trouble was street violence, and of course, we also dealt with B , murder, youth crime, and so on. I came to realize that the people ⁽⁷⁾ pulling the strings were the gangs.

Interviewer: Describe the work involved in pursuing gangs. What did you do in the organized-crime department?

Nakabayashi: It's 80 percent investigation, 20 percent arrests. Nowadays there are computers, so you can input all the information you have— C, the money trail, cars, recordings of phone calls, and so on—into a database, and then you can see the whole pattern of an individual's actions.

Interviewer: A

Nakabayashi: I never did. Even when I went into a situation where there were guns, there was no fear. In those situations, I felt secure as long as I focused my whole mind on two things: ma'ai, that is, the distance between myself and the other party, and timing.

Interviewer: Could you explain that a little more?

Nakabayashi: Timing—to make sure you don't burst in on them at the wrong moment. For the most part, gang members won't set out to do anything to a police officer. The situation where gangs really are scary, however, is when they become what in medical terms you may call a cancer. When you can't see what they are doing because they are using third parties and youths for their own profit, then that is dangerous.

Interviewer: Tell me about the new anti-gang ordinances. ^(t)

Nakabayashi: It has always been illegal to extort, that is, to obtain something by force, but the new ordinances also make paying an extortionist illegal. The new regulations are saying that if you give a gang some sort of benefit, such as money, D, or influence, then you are going to pay a penalty.

Interviewer: You mentioned that the existence of gangs was the reason you joined the police force. What is the ultimate goal in dealing with the gangs?

Nakabayashi: One of the goals is a healthy society. What it means is that you make a society in which people are not afraid of the (1 .) (2) (3) (4) (5) (6), so ^(x) feelings of guilt don't turn inward and turn into secrets.

That's the kind of thing the gangs feed on.

- (a) Interviewer: Since your retirement, you have been working for the National Center for the Elimination of Gangs. What is your advice for people who fear falling victim to gangs?
- Nakabayashi: Visit your local Center. We can recommend lawyers, and we conduct training sessions for business owners. Society as a whole is trying to cut relations with the gangs. With the new ordinances and the Centers, I think we are headed in the right E.
